More movement on Maple: Technological changes make traffic management more science than art

ienna commuters, are you grimacing and glancing at the clock a little less and smiling and singing along to the radio a little more? Have you noticed that your morning and especially your evening travel times along Maple Avenue have improved recently?

It's not your imagination. Thanks to recent adjustments made by the Town to signal cycle times and to synchronization of the 10 traffic signals that dot Maple Avenue through Vienna, traffic flow along and accessibility to Maple from side streets have improved noticeably. You're getting to work, home, or wherever you're headed quicker!

The Town of Vienna has been working on the effort for about a year with synchronization changes implemented in October; additional tweaks at a couple of intersections and continued upgrades in traffic signal controllers will further enhance drivers' experience along Maple Avenue. The good news, says General Maintenance and Traffic Engineering Supervisor Chad Charles is that "there's more room to improve traffic flow."

The process started, says Public Works Director Michael Gallagher, when the Town partnered with transportation consultant Gorove/Slade of Washington, DC, to conduct a traffic count and record the time required for vehicles to travel the corridor, analyze synchronization options using actual counts via computer modeling, and recommend changes to the Town's signal management.

The signal cycle period was reduced from 190 seconds to 140 seconds for the morning peak and 160 seconds for evening peak hours. It was reduced from 150 to 130 and 140 seconds for mid-day and weekend hours, respectively. (Signals along Maple Avenue are coordinated from 10 am-10 pm on weekends; during other weekend hours, the system is in free operation, which means it's "first come, first served," says Charles.)

"With the new signal timing," Charles says, "we've noticed that the flow is a lot better than it was. It's not as congested. The changes mean that vehicles aren't sitting so long on side streets, which also helps reduce pollution from idling cars. We've noticed that not only is traffic flow smoother on Maple, but vehicles wanting to access Maple from side streets and businesses are finding gaps in which they can make a left."

Computer modeling shows, notes Gallagher, that the implemented changes resulted in a 13% reduction in total travel time during the morning, 35% in the evening, and 20% on weekends.

The synchronization efforts cost a total of about $100,000, which was funded through VDOT-administered federal funds.

There's still room for additional improvement. At the November 21 Town Council meeting, public works was expected to request approximately $25,000 to purchase additional new controllers and GPS modules that would allow all signals to be synchronized to the same clock time, which would prevent constant drifting of individual controller clocks and the need for adjustments at each signal box.

In the future, public works hopes to further upgrade its technological capabilities so that traffic can be monitored and adjustments made from a centralized control center. In addition, the Town will continue to replace, as funds are available, two-pole intersection signals with a 4-pole configuration, which permits audible pedestrian signals and better alignment of signal heads. The Town also is looking to coordinate with VDOT to better synchronize signals along Nutley Street.

Pay attention to pedestrians

General Maintenance and Traffic Engineering Supervisor Chad Charles pays a lot of attention to how vehicles, bicyclists, and pedestrians move around Town, and one issue that he's noticed relates to vehicles making right-hand turns when pedestrians have the right of way. Probably because they've idled at a stoplight for several seconds, drivers are eager to GO when their light turns green. If you're making a right-hand turn, though, Charles notes, you should be aware that any pedestrians waiting to cross the street you're turning onto have also gotten the "go" signal and have the right of way. So drivers making right-hand turns, please pay attention and yield to pedestrians in crosswalks.

County, state give green nods to Vienna

he Town of Vienna's Community Enhancement Commission (CEC) was one of seven individuals and organizations recognized October 18 by Fairfax County with a 2016 Environmental Excellence Award. The citizen-based, Town Council-appointed committee is having a really good year as earlier this fall CEC-led efforts resulted in the Town of Vienna earning certification from the National Wildlife Federation as a Community Wildlife Habitat.

About the county Environmental Excellence Award, Councilmember Carey Sienicki says: "The Community Enhancement Commission is well-deserving of this award. Through their organized but approachable style, real improvements in the quality of life of citizens, businesses, and organizations have been made as has a lasting impact to Vienna's future in our built and natural environments. We appreciate that CEC members have shared their wealth of knowledge through engagement and education so that we can all be better stewards in the world by making the right choices." The CEC's mission is to develop, promote, and coordinate voluntary efforts to improve the appearance of the Town of Vienna and to educate citizens about environmental initiatives. In addition to the National Wildlife Federation effort, programs initiated or supported by the CEC include eco-efficient homes, Solarize Vienna, native plant sales, sustainable home/garden tours, "ivy free" Vienna, and inclusion of an environment and sustainability chapter in the Town's comprehensive plan.

CEC members are Maureen Alonso, Joanne Burke (co-chair), Christina Caplan, Emma Choi, Desireé DiMauro, Bob Robinson, Jack Ruszkowski, Tara Ruszkowski, Ross Shearer (emeritus), David Steiner, and Susan Stillman (chair).

Also, at the Virginia Municipal League (VML) annual conference in October, VML recognized the Town of Vienna as a certified green government "for successfully implementing environmental policies and taking practical actions to reduce carbon emissions."

Celebrate the season at Town Council reception

he Mayor and Town Council invite everyone to celebrate the season at a light holiday reception from 4-6 p.m. Friday, December 9, in Council Chambers at Town Hall. Refreshments will be provided by the Town and Vienna Volunteer Fire Department Auxiliary. Providing the party's seasonal entertainment are the Madison High School Madrigals at 4:30 p.m. and Thoreau Chamber Choir at 5 p.m. No need to RSVP to this free event as it is open to everyone. We hope to see you there. Cheers!

Town brings up Serfass for 'major league' finance assignment ike outfielder Jayson Werth on her beloved Washington Nationals, Marion Serfass is a veteran who can still hit homeruns. After 17 years with the Town of Vienna team, Serfass will now "play" in a new line-up position as the Town's director of finance, effective October 31.

"Marion has demonstrated that she is a very strong leader in the field of local government finance," says Town Manager Mercury Payton. "Her ability to communicate very complex and challenging fiscal issues in a way that is understandable and with solutions offered made her an extremely strong candidate."

Serfass was selected as finance director following a national search.

"Throughout my career, I've been lucky to be in the right place at the right time," says Serfass. "As my children have gotten older, I've been looking for a leadership position. I'm lucky to have found it right here where I've worked for 17 years and four blocks from home."

Prior to joining the Town of Vienna, where she has been deputy finance director and served two stints as acting finance director and one as acting human resources director, Serfass was regional controller in the retirement community division with Marriott Corporation, where she worked for 14 years. She began her career at Ernst and Young.

Serfass has a bachelor's degree in accounting and finance from Miami University in Ohio, where she grew up as a Cleveland Indians fan. She is a certified public accountant and has lived in the Town of Vienna since 1989.

Serfass says that her efforts moving forward as director will be to maintain the Town's AAA bond rating, continue to promote fiscally conservative policies and practices, and provide additional reporting on performance measures.

"The Town has historically been a good steward of citizens' tax funds," Serfass says. "Going forward, we will strive to be more transparent in our reporting of how those funds are used."

Serfass enjoys following baseball, reading, traveling, and spending time with her family, which includes her husband, college-freshman daughter, and eighth-grade son. \boldsymbol{V}

Stream restoration project provides makeover that's more than surface deep

he Hunters Branch stream in Vienna recently received a makeover that's definitely more than surface deep. While the Town's restoration project has transformed the once wild-looking and steep stream bank into a lovely, inviting, and more natural streambed, the real benefactors of the project are the aquatic and land-based wildlife and plant life around the stream.

"This project also has a regional impact," notes Vienna's Public Works Director Michael Gallagher. "Anything downstream, including the Chesapeake Bay, will benefit from the reduction in sediment, which carries with it many pollutants. This project is really about improving water quality and reducing pollutants."

Work on the restoration project began around the first of the year and was essentially completed late in the spring. The contractor, Angler Environmental, returned this fall to plant hundreds of seedlings, trees, and ground cover around the stream.

Over time, Gallagher explains, erosion can reduce the quality of natural streambeds, making them appear steep and dangerous. Projects like this one recreate a more natural stream and streambed, where water pools or flows in various areas.

Large rocks were used to create the pool areas and also to help stabilize the bank. This particular project also was designed to minimally impact trees, Gallagher adds, noting that no trees were hauled from the site. Trunks from some of the trees that were removed were used to provide structural stability. Others, along with root balls, were sunk below the waterline to bring carbons back into the stream, which helps support wildlife habitat. Other removed trees were used to create a mulch trail on the site.

Gallagher reports that while inspecting completed sections throughout the rehabilitation process he came across ducks, deer, and fox. The cost of the project was approximately $1.5 million, of which the Town of Vienna contributed $100,000. The remainder was funded through a Department of Environmental Quality grant and Fairfax County Stormwater District tax monies.

Points earned for this project as well as a similar one at Wolftrap Creek in Wildwood Park helped the Town earn certification earlier this year from the National Wildlife Federation as a Community Wildlife Habitat.

This kind of stream restoration project, says Gallagher, is one of the few ways that the Town of Vienna can have a large impact on improving regional water quality and reducing pollutants. The Town is poised to bid out a similar project for Wolftrap Creek Phase II. \forall

'D is for shotgun' and other lessons learned on a night on patrol

Editor's note: Communications Specialist Adam Kincaid spent a recent Saturday evening riding along with one of Vienna's finest, Ofc. Bradley Reedy. While Vienna is a safe suburban community – not by chance but by design – its dark streets did provide some eye-opening lessons for the Town's young writer/photographer.

y atypical Saturday evening started with roll call at 6:50 p.m. We (the handful of officers who would be serving and protecting Vienna that evening and myself) reviewed reports from the prior night. At the end, shift supervisor Sgt. Conor Tracy turned to me and asked: "Any questions, Adam?" But I was already too lost in the jargon of police acronyms and codes to really know what was going on.

I had been paired with Ofc. Bradley Reedy for my ride-along. I'd been told that he was one of Vienna's most proactive officers with a reputation for effectively employing traffic stops to get drunk drivers and drugs off of the streets. "A kilo of coke is worth 32 grand" was one of the life lessons I learned that evening from one of Reedy's colleagues, MPO Kenneth Smith, who had recently finished an undercover stint.

As Reedy is a Virginia Tech grad with four years of policing experience, I felt pretty confident about our chances of surviving the evening. Then we hopped into the freezing-cold cab of his police car, which was wired with intricate buttons and electronics that made it look like the Batmobile. He pointed to one of many switches on the center console, and what he said next made my imagination run wild. He stoically looked at me while firmly tapping a switch labeled with a capital D and said: "When it goes down, remember, the letter D is for shotgun. Hit D to unlock its compartment." I glanced at the steel 12-gauge standing tall between our heads and took a deep, visible breath.

Reedy and I didn't make it three lights heading north on Maple Avenue before the cruiser's dash radar clocked a car going 51 mph in the opposite direction. We pulled a U-turn and flipped the lights to hot in pursuit. After we made the stop and Reedy had a brief conversation with the driver, he wrote him a ticket. I hopped out to take photos but my fingers were chilled and I had trouble turning the camera dials. We moved on.

At 8:40 p.m. I experienced my first domestic disturbance call and learned something else: EDP in police lingo refers to an "emotionally disturbed person." Officers know how to approach and be courteous to individuals who, in unscientific terms, are "freaking out."

After dispatch reported a highly heated argument in the northwest section of Town, Reedy and I hustled to the residential address on Lawyers Road. We approached a house to find officers Smith and Andrew Slebonick already leaping from their cars to speak with a family of four. At first there was no way I was getting out of the car, until eventually Tracy, who had also shown up on the scene, opened the driver door and told me: "It's safe."

It didn't really sound safe, though. A distressed woman was yelling outside of her family's house about an event earlier in the evening that had upset her. Smith and Slebonick spoke with the family while Reedy and Tracy calmed the woman down.

I learned that one of an officer's most effective policing skills is the ability to disarm a person's anxiety. Some people may only speak to a police officer once or twice in their life, so careful listening and people skills are police prerequisites. The Vienna Police Department has made it a priority to ensure that all officers receive specialized training in the principles of crisis intervention and how to handle such events.

As we drove through Cedar Park at 9:56 p.m., Reedy rolled down his window. It was early, but the cool air already felt like sandpaper.

"I like to listen to what's going on in some places," said Reedy. "Sometimes things don't get dispatched that should. Someone could be getting attacked and not have a chance to call the police and keeping an open ear can make that difference."

I copiously thumbed my notes into my iPhone in the cramped cab while cradling my Nikon under a tight forearm. Reedy knew I was into cameras, so he showed me his dash cam's zoom magnification. He narrowed in on a suspicious character we were watching while simultaneously displaying the feed on the cab's laptop. I was impressed with his one-handed tech abilities.

A few hours later, at 1:30 a.m., we conducted a sobriety test on an almost deserted Maple Avenue. Reedy had pulled over a swerving car, which was driven by a woman who, it turns out, had a lengthy history of driving problems. After carefully approaching the car, gently making his presence known with a simple but steady hand plant on the back left tail light, Reedy administered a sobriety test. The woman passed perfectly, and Reedy made note. Our driver was transporting her intoxicated boyfriend home, and despite her history of speeding tickets and traffic violations, Reedy said: "It's good to see people doing the right thing." He gave them a verbal warning and kindly said "Goodnight."

After the stop, I asked him: "Every car we've pulled over tonight you always touch the back left tail light. Is that by design?" Reedy responded: "Yes. In a worst case scenario, you leave a trace. It's from back in the old days, they still teach it today at the academy." It was weird talking about the on-the-job possibility of life or death, and yet handling every stop in such a nonchalant way.

At 3 a.m. it was time to call it a night. Reedy filled up the gas tank at the Town's Northside Property Yard and we rolled back into the police station. Before I left for my car, Reedy casually said to me: "Thanks for coming out. I hope we showed you a little insight on how we work."

Turning lemons into lemonade, er, leaves into mulch

by Adam Kincaid, Communications Specialist

rees are recycling experts. They are smart enough to grow their own fertilizer. It's the Town's job to help make the process more effective and keep Vienna streets tidy. Leaf collection service, continuing through the end of the year, is the first half of the process; mulch delivery is part two.

"Trees create their own fertilizer, which is in their leaves, and is why trees drop them during the cold season," says Construction Inspector Rebecca Greenberg, who also is a certified arborist. "The best fertilizer for plants comes from what is native to them, which is why the Town's leaf recycling program is so beneficial."

After leaf collection is completed, the leaves are ground into mulch at a Town facility on Beulah Road, and mulch delivery starts in mid-January. Beginning December 1, residents may place a mulch order by calling the mulch order line at 703-255-6388 or public works at 703-255-6380 or by completing an online order form at viennava.gov/forms. aspx?FID=157. The deadline for placing orders is February 28. V

Go green this holiday season

he Town's Public Works Department can help you discard in an environmentally friendly way some traditionally difficultto-recycle items at its next Quarterly Recycling Day. From 8 a.m.-2 p.m. Saturday, December 3, the Town will accept electronics, used motor oil, antifreeze, and batteries for recycling at the Northside Property Yard, 600 Mill Street NE.

There are a few "nono's" at the Quarterly Recycling Day. The Town does not accept CRT-type, or "large backside," computers and TVs. Also, hazardous waste such as insecticides, paint, and other chemicals are not accepted. Otherwise, the Town is happy to help you clear out your space to make room for more holiday decorations and gifts.

Water conservation funding available to homeowners

by Joanne Burke, Community Enhancement Commission

o you find pockets of standing water in your yard after every rain? One remedy is to install a rain garden. In addition to providing an environmentally sound solution to urban stormwater runoff, rain gardens provide many benefits to homeowners, including but not limited to:

- · removal of standing water in your yard
- · reduction in mosquito breeding
- · less potential for home flooding
- · conservation of water
- creation of habitats for birds and butterflies.

Thanks to an initiative sponsored by the Virginia Conservation Assistance Program, the Northern Virginia Soil and Water Conservation District (NVSWCD) is providing "financial incentives to homeowners living in Fairfax County to create more watershed-friendly landscapes."

The program provides reimbursements for installing rain gardens, conservation landscapes, and porous pavement/pavers as well as for removal of impervious surfaces and other various water conservation projects. Homeowners may be reimbursed up to 75% of rain garden installation costs (up to $2,000 for a minimum size of 100 square feet). While the conservation assistance program is titled as a 2016 program, there currently is no set end date and, depending upon participation levels, the program may continue for years to come.

Homeowners must provide a plan to the NVSWCD, request a site visit, and commit to a 10-year maintenance agreement to ensure viability of the project. The NVSWCD is currently accepting site visit requests and applications for spring 2017 and recommending that planting be completed by mid-May 2017.

To find out more about the application process and eligibility requirements, visit fairfaxcounty.gov/nvswcd/cap/caphomeowner.htm.

Kris and his human partner, Officer Richard Finelli, gave chase at about 3 a.m. October 30 to a suspicious person seen running across the police station parking lot. After being sniffed out by Kris behind the Vienna Medical Center, the suspect was arrested for burglarizing the Patrick Henry Library.
